

Open for worldwide standards

CBC has joined the worldwide sector forum ONVIF (Open Network Video Interface). In this way, the leading manufacturer of video surveillance technology is supporting the initiative of the industry forum for the development of a global interface standard for network video products.

Inter-manufacturer compatibility is a significant aspect for the broad acceptance of network video solutions. For this reason, the worldwide sector platform ONVIF (Open Network Video Interface Forum) was set up in 2008. The aim of the industry forum is to develop a global open standard for the interfaces of network video products.

CBC has been supporting the initiative for more openness on the network video market since February 2010. "The ONVIF standards facilitate integration, release resources and reduce costs," Andreas Franusic, Manager of the CBC product marketing team, summarises the reasons for joining. "Additionally they accelerate the use of network video products and lead to more and more security systems being linked together."

With the ZN-C-series the company will soon bring the first CBC network cameras with ONVIF support onto the market. "In this way, we are not only supporting the organisational goals, we are also setting an example for the sustainability of our products," says Andreas Franusic.

➤ CBC (Germany) GmbH with headquarters in Düsseldorf belongs to the CBC group and is one of the largest manufacturers of video surveillance systems.
